Engine Failures R Us

Anthony Parete

Woo wee, interesting three-hour flight over Canton yesterday. Flew from Miller Field in Alliance west to Wooster. Got to Akron/Canton and somebody was burning something just west of downtown Canton. The smoke was drifting perpendicular to my flight path at about 2,000', so I figured I'd climb and fly over the smoke instead of right through it. Throttle to full power, stick back, and then silence as the RPMs dropped to idle. No climb power at all. Jesus H. Chrysler, that will wake your ass up! Initially I thought it had something to do with the smoke. Looking for a place to make an emergency landing, I saw only buildings to my left, trees in front of me, and a lake behind me. Wouldn't you know it, on my right there was a cemetery, of all things. It had a trifling amount of open grassy space available, but mostly there were a lot of tombstones. Nice solid concrete blocks with my name on every one of them just waiting for somebody to come along and chisel in the date of death. Shitscrews! Aw man, engine... can't we all just get along? Anyway, I was sinking like a rock and thinking that at least the IRS wouldn't be after me anymore. Then I looked over my shoulder one more time and found that one of the spark plug leads had vibrated right off the spark plug. I reached back, fumbled around, reattached the errant lead, and PRESTO, full power. Made it to Wooster, all the while checking the spark plug lead about every two seconds. It turns out that the terminal on the tip of the plug (NGK BR8ES plugs, by the way) wasn't tight, and the lead wouldn't stay tight on the plug. I tightened the terminal, and she ran like a dream. On the way back I flew over Skypark. That place used to be busy as hell, but yesterday no one was flying. Too bad.
